New Island, Falklands

Ruggedly beautiful and remote, New Island is located at the extreme west of the Falklands' archipelago. Since 1996 the island has been owned and run by The New Island Conservation Trust. Dramatic cliffs contrast with sheltered sandy bays and natural harbors. New Island has a large concentration and great diversity of wildlife. It is also one of the driest places with an annual rainfall of less than 40cms (16").

Long used as a base for whaling, as a sheep farm and for occasional attempts to collect guano, New Island is considered by some to be one of the most beautiful islands in the Falklands archipelago.

Over forty species of birds breed on New Island including four species of penguin. Thin-billed prions are a highlight along with skuas, striated caracara and peregrine falcons.

Marine mammals are also plentiful. Peale's dolphins breed in inshore waters, sea lions are often observed and fur seal colonies are found around the island.

The highlight is a large colony of rockhopper penguins and black-browed albatrosses on the cliffs opposite the settlement on the western side of the island.
